 The best thing to Pier Paolo Pasolini's The Gospel According to St. Matthew is the matter to which it handles the subject it depicts, it never succumbs to a specific bias. Many films about the life of Jesus Christ exist but there is a reason as to why Pier Paolo Pasolini's take happens to be the very best of the bunch.

 Pier Paolo Pasolini's documentary Notes for an African Orestes is an exciting film: it offers excitement to the mind. Aeschylus wrote several plays about the house of Atreus, and the family's troubled relation to love and politics; and the premise of Notes for an African Orestes is the Italian film director's plans to make a cinematic work of Aeschylus's plays about Orestes, of the house of Atreus, in Africa.

 Pasolini's writing collaborator Sergio Citti had originally been attached to direct the intended adaptation of the Marquis de Sade's The 120 Days of Sodom. During the creation of the first drafts of the script, Pasolini appealed to several of his usual collaborators, among them Citti, Claudio Masenza, Antonio Troisi and specially Pupi Avati.

 By the early '60s, however, the cinema became Pasolini's central focus. After scrapping the completed screenplay for a project titled La Commare Secca (which he then passed along to Bernardo Bertolucci), he wrote another script, Accatone, which he directed in the slums with a non-professional cast in 1961. As with his literary debut, his film debut became the subject of much controversy, with moralists holding up the picture as proof of the need for stricter censorship guidelines.
